

Heard the Buzz About Royal Jelly?

Long used as a natural skincare ingredient, DHC USA introduces nutrient-rich Royal Jelly supplement

SAN FRANCISCO, Calif., December 3, 2007—

Imagine you are a worker bee toiling away to better your colony when you notice the queen bee walk by. She is twice as large as you, stronger, and healthier. That might get you thinking, “I’ll have what she’s having.” DHC USA Inc., a distinguished provider of high-quality skincare products, makeup, nutritional supplements, and fine foods, introduces its newest supplement, Royal Jelly, to its family of products.

Often referred to as a “complete food,” royal jelly contains an impressive array of nutrients: proteins; 18 amino acids; vitamins A, C, D, and K; and all major B vitamins—B₁, riboflavin (B₂), niacin, pantothenic acid (B₅), B₆, biotin, folic acid, and B₁₂. It also contains the minerals calcium, iron, and potassium.

“The queen bee enjoys a diet exclusively of royal jelly, and if her superior strength, stamina, and longevity are any indication,” explains Hadrian Miguel, Product Development Manager for DHC USA in San Francisco, “royal jelly has the potential to be a useful nutritional supplement for people.”

“DHC is a company that believes in whole health and beauty derived from the balance of nature and science,” says Miguel. “We feel so strongly about royal jelly’s nourishing properties, we use it in a number of our skincare products. It’s only natural that once we began offering DHC Supplements, we would make a dietary version also.”
